VU Research Portal

Politized Identity

van Stekelenburg, J.; van Leeuwen, A.; van Troost, D.M.M.

published in

The Wiley-Blackwell Encyclopedia of Social and Political Movements
2013

DOI (link to publisher)

10.1002/9780470674871.wbespm163

Link to publication in VU Research Portal

citation for published version (APA)

van Stekelenburg, J., van Leeuwen, A., & van Troost, D. M. M. (2013). Politized Identity. In D. A. Snow, D. Della Porta, P. G. Klandermans, & D. McAdam (Eds.), The Wiley-Blackwell Encyclopedia of Social and Political Movements (pp. 974-977). WileyBlackwell. <https://doi.org/10.1002/9780470674871.wbespm163>

General rights

Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the public portal are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

- Users may download and print one copy of any publication from the public portal for the purpose of private study or research.
- You may not further distribute the material or use it for any profit-making activity or commercial gain
- You may freely distribute the URL identifying the publication in the public portal ?

Take down policy

If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

E-mail address:

vuresearchportal.ub@vu.nl

Politicized identity

JACQUELIEN VAN STEKELENBURG, ANOUK VAN LEEUWEN and DUNYA VAN TROOST

Politicization of identities is key to the dynamics of contention. Protest movements are built on politicized identities and they are populated by people with politicized identities. Politicization of identities is simultaneously a characteristic of collectivities and people. There exists a division of labor between students of politicization of identities. Sociologists tend to study politicization at the collective level on the supply side of contentious politics, while social psychologists typically focus on the individual level of politicization at the demand side of politics (cf. Klandermans 2004). The politicization of the supply side of protest refers to the characteristics of protest movements. Is it a movement people can identify with? Is the movement able to frame personal problems into political claims? The politicization of demand refers to the potential of protestors in a society. It relates to the problems people perceive in a society and whether people attach political meaning to these problems. In order to understand how the division of labor conceptually and empirically affects the study of this phenomenon, we will briefly elaborate on the concept of identity.

Identity is our understanding of who we are. Simon and colleagues (1998) succinctly describe identity as a place in society. A place is a metaphorical expression for any position on any socially relevant dimension such as nationality, ethnicity, gender, age, and so forth. A person has a personal identity and several social identities. Personal identity refers to self-definition in terms of personal attributes, whereas social identity refers to self-definition in terms of social category memberships (Tajfel & Turner 1979). Collective identity concerns cognitions shared by members of a single group (Taylor & Whittier 1992). Hence, collective identity is a group characteristic – group members' shared beliefs, destiny, and feelings – while social identity is a characteristic of a person – the idiosyncratic remake derived from these shared beliefs, destiny, and feelings. Group identification forms the link between collective and social identity. The stronger the group identification, the more the shared beliefs, destiny, and feelings comprised in the group's collective identity are incorporated in the individual's social identity. However, individuals do not incorporate the complete picture, but rather a selection of what a collective identity encompasses. These idiosyncratic remakes of collective beliefs at the individual level create a variety in the content of social identities. Indeed, not all Americans, Muslims, workers, women, or gays have identical social identities, yet they do feel American, Muslim, and so on. Importantly, identities vary in strength, and identifying more or less strongly with a group makes a real difference, especially in political contexts. The more people identify with others involved, the more they will incorporate shared destiny, shared emotions, and enhanced efficaciousness (see Simon et al. 1998; Yzerbyt et al. 2003; Van Zomeren, Postmes, & Spears 2008). It is therefore the strength of group identification rather than group identification per se that influences group members' readiness to view themselves and act in terms of their group membership (Huddy 2001).

Salience of a collective identity does not necessarily make that identity politically relevant; collective identities must politicize to become the engine of collective action. Politicization of identities begins with the awareness of shared grievances for which an external enemy must be blamed. Next, claims for compensation must be leveled against this enemy. Unless appropriate compensation is granted, the power struggle continues. If in the course of this struggle the group seeks to win the support of third parties, such as more powerful authorities (e.g., the national government) or the general public, identities fully politicize (Simon & Klandermans 2001). Politicization of identities and the underlying power struggle unfold as a sequence of politicizing events that gradually transform the group's relationship to its social environment, whereby the tactical choices are again shaped by identity (Polletta 2009).

2 POLITICIZED IDENTITY

What distinguishes politicized collective identity from collective identity? First, raised consciousness: "the growing awareness of shared grievances and a clearer idea of who or what is responsible for those grievances reflect a distinct cognitive elaboration of one's worldview providing group members with a meaningful perspective on the social world and their place in it" (Simon & Klandermans 2001: 327). The second distinction is about the relation with other groups. A politicized identity provides antagonistic lenses through which the social world is interpreted. This intergroup polarization defines other groups in the social and political arena as "pro" or "con," thus as allies or opponents. The third distinction concerns the unique behavioral correlates of politicized collective identity, namely, politicized group members are more likely to engage in collective action directed at the government or the general public to force them to intervene or to take sides.

The theoretical division of labor reflects in the phenomena that are studied. Sociologists study collective identity by examining such phenomena as the group's symbols, rituals, beliefs, and the values its members share. Social psychologists study group identification by examining what it means to an individual to belong to the group and will thus implicitly or explicitly refer to the pride of being a member of the group, to the individual's beliefs, sentiments, and commitment to the group (Klandermans & Roggeband 2007; Van Stekelenburg and Klandermans 2007; Van Doorn et al. forthcoming). Not surprisingly, the same division of labor can be found for politicized identities.

POLITICIZATION OF SUPPLY

Central to the sociological literature is the work of Taylor and Whittier (1992), who clarify both theoretically and empirically how strong bonds existing in social networks shape political actors. Within these networks individuals come to see themselves as part of a group when some shared characteristic becomes salient and is defined as important. As a result, boundaries are drawn between "a challenging and a dominant group" (1992: 175). These boundaries are not clear cut, stable, and objectively visible, but exist in the shared meaning attributed to group membership by group members. The second component is consciousness. Consciousness consists of both raising awareness of group membership and the realization of the group's position within society, in comparison to other groups. This position must be perceived as illegitimate or unjust to make group membership politically relevant. The third component is negotiation. Within and outside their networks, people negotiate in order to change symbolic meanings of daily life's thinking and acting – "the politicization of daily life" – and to free the group from dominant representations or to undermine the status quo in the power balance between groups in the larger system. Social movement organizations do their utmost to politicize an identity by framing personal grievances in political claims and by offering their supporters the opportunity to act upon these political claims. Hence, political and identity entrepreneurs use their power, resources, and creativity to pull a collectivity together and to turn grievances into claims. As a consequence, organized identities are more likely to mobilize than unorganized identities.

POLITICIZATION OF DEMAND

From a social psychological perspective, group identification is crucial to politicization of an identity. People who strongly identify with a social movement organization feel an "inner obligation" to participate on behalf of the group (Stürmer et al. 2003). The more identities politicize, the more aggrieved and efficacious people feel and the more they participate in movements of change. Politicized identities are dual identities. González and Brown (2003) coined the term “dual identity” to point out that one individual can at the same time identify with two – competing – groups. For instance, workers going on strike can at the same time identify with the union and with the company. Two competing identities that are active at the same time cause “cross-pressure” (Oegema & Klandermans 1994). However, this does not mean that dual identification is detrimental to protest participation. On the contrary, workers who are loyal to the company are the ones who will make the effort of acting collectively against it – in a legal and peaceful way (Simon & Ruhs 2008; Simon & Grabow 2010). Simon and Ruhs (2008) showed that dual identification – with both an ethnic minority and the nation as a whole – spurred protest, a finding replicated and further specified by Klandermans, van der Toorn, and van Stekelenburg (2008). They report that immigrants who display a dual identification tend to be more satisfied with their situation than those who do not display such identity, but if they are dissatisfied, they will be more likely to participate in protest. Recently, Langner (2010) developed a measure of politicized collective identity in terms of social identity content that assesses individual differences in the political meaning of an identity. The more group members attach political meaning to their identity, the more likely they will engage in protest.

Hence, sociologists study politicization at the collective level on the supply side of contentious politics, while social psychologists focus on the individual level at the demand side of politics. In reality, politicization of identities involves a mesh between individual and collective levels. We can learn from work that focuses on a single level, but neither is adequate by itself if we want to understand how politicization of identities translates into protest. Interdisciplinary work that treats politicization as the interplay between the two levels – between collectivities actively “pulling” a collective identity together and people being “pushed” onto the streets as political meaning is attached to their identities – is needed. When people participate in protest staged by a social movement organization, this is the result of mobilization that successfully brought demand and supply together. In unraveling politicizing identities an interdisciplinary approach focusing on politicization processes of supply and demand might be helpful.

SEE ALSO: Collective identity; Demand and supply of protest; Dual identity; Identity politics; Political socialization and social movements.

REFERENCES AND SUGGESTED READINGS

- González, R., and Brown, R. (2003) Generalization of positive attitude as a function of subgroup and superordinate group identifications in intergroup contact. European Journal of Social Psychology 33(2), 195–214.
- Huddy, L. (2001) From social to political identity: A critical examination of social identity theory. Political Psychology 22(1), 127–156.
- Klandermans, B. (2004) The demand and supply of participation: Social psychological correlates of participation in social movements. In: Snow, D.A., Soule, S.A., and Kriesi, H. (eds), The Blackwell Companion to Social Movements. Blackwell, Oxford.
- Klandermans, B., and Roggeband, C. (2007) Handbook of Social Movements across Disciplines. Springer Verlag, New York.
- Klandermans, B., van der Toorn, J., and van Stekelenburg, J. (2008) Embeddedness and identity: How immigrants turn grievances into action. American Sociological Review 73(6), 992.
- Langner, C.A. (2010) Politicized collective identity: Psychological structure, content differences across social groups, and relation to attitude importance and behavior.
- Oegema, D., and Klandermans, B. (1994). Why social movement sympathizers don't participate: Erosion and nonconversion of support. American Sociological Review 59(5), 703–722.
- Polletta, F. (2009) Grievances and identities. Paper presented at the Conference on Advancements in Social Movement Theories, Amsterdam, 30 Sept.–2 Oct.

4 POLITICIZED IDENTITY

- Simon, B., and Grabow, O. (2010) The politicization of migrants: Further evidence that politicized collective identity is a dual identity. Political Psychology 31(5), 717–738.
- Simon, B., and Klandermans, B. (2001) Towards a social psychological analysis of politicized collective identity: Conceptualization, antecedents, and consequences. American Psychologist 56(4), 319–331.
- Simon, B., and Ruhs, D. (2008) Identity and politicization among Turkish migrants in Germany: The role of dual identification. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 95(6), 1354–1366.
- Simon, B., Loewy, M., Sturmer, S., Weber, U., Freytag, P., Habig, C., Kampmeier, C., and Spahlinger, P. (1998) Collective identification and social movement participation. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 74(3), 646–658.
- Stürmer, S., Simon, B., Loewy, M., and Jörger, H. (2003) The dual-pathway model of social movement participation: The case of the fat acceptance movement. Social Psychology Quarterly 66, 71–82.
- Tajfel, H., and Turner, J. (1979) An integrative theory of intergroup conflict. In: Austin, W.G., and Worchel, S. (eds), The Social Psychology of Intergroup Relations. Brooks/Cole Publishing, Monterey, CA, pp. 33–47.
- Taylor, V., and Whittier, N.E. (1992) Collective identity in social movement communities: Lesbian feminist mobilization. In: Morris, A., and Mueller, C. (eds), Frontiers of Social Movement Theory. Yale University Press, New Haven, CT, pp. 104–129.
- Van Doorn, M., Prins, J., and Welschen, S. (forthcoming) Promoting or preventing politicization: Identity construction in interaction. In: van Stekelenburg, J., Roggeband, C.M., and Klandermans, B. (eds), The Changing Dynamics of Contention. University of Minnesota Press, Minnesota.
- Van Stekelenburg, J., and Klandermans, B. (2007) Individuals in movements: A social psychology of contention. In: Klandermans, B., and Roggeband, C. (eds), Handbook of Social Movements across Disciplines. Springer Verlag, New York.
- Van Zomeren, M., Postmes, T., and Spears, R. (2008) Toward an integrative social identity model of collective action: A quantitative research synthesis of three socio-psychological perspectives. Psychological Bulletin 134(4), 504.
- Yzerbyt, V., Dumont, M., Wigboldus, D., and Gordijn, E. (2003) I feel for us: The impact of categorization and identification on emotions and action tendencies. British Journal of Social Psychology 42(4), 533–549.