Although once a dream of mine, in the end becoming a PhD student happened as a result of all kinds of developments at the workplace, both in teacher education and in educational policy. Nevertheless, the project was started out of curiosity and proved to be an interesting learning experience which brought me to new places, meeting new people and learning new things. Now, at the end, my curiosity has only increased and there still remains plenty to be studied and learned. I hope that, in the future, teacher educators, student teachers, and researchers will feel inspired to continue along the reported insights.

Such an intellectual and practical project is impossible to undertake without the advice and support of loyal companions. Monique and Mieke, you were the ones who taught me how to put my ideas and findings into words acceptable in the figured worlds of the academic. Working with you felt like reinventing collaboration and teamwork. Your inspiring enthusiasm, your permanent belief in the project and in me were indispensable for moving forward and, in the end, for even finishing the study. Nevertheless, until now I am still a journeyman considering you my Masters. Anja, Miranda, Rosanne, Judith and Marcel, you are the best professional comrades one can wish for; always helpful and willing to discuss ideas and findings. Each of you left your marks based on your expertise and personalities. Together you represent all the support I needed to undertake and finish this endeavour successfully. Thank you all for being there.

Doing practice-related research also asks a lot of practice itself. I especially want to thank the mentor teachers, student teachers and school-based teacher educators who were so collaboratively involved in this process. I cannot call all of you by name, but you know who you are. I felt privileged thanks to the opportunities you gave me by letting me attend your classes and conversations, which requires much courage and a risk taking attitude on your part. It was an important and pleasant occurrence which enabled me to share in your knowledge and experiences, although, of course, I stayed a peripheral member of your communities.

Additionally, I want to thank my colleagues from the 'Werkgroep Opleiden in de School' and the ATEE RDC Professional Development of Teacher Educators for their support. Together with the (student) teachers you helped me find the words I needed in the world of teacher education. Also, my thanks to all Dutch and international colleagues from schools and institutes who took such interest in this project by asking, discussing and providing help. And, of course, all the ladies who in many ways helped me getting everything done.

I would also like to thank VU University for providing me with the time to realise this project. Especially I thank the participating schools for opening their doors to me.

Despite the support of all of the communities surrounding a PhD student, and despite the satisfaction stemming from the ultimate outcome and the joys of working with practitioners, it was a hard and rather lonely process. A process which almost alienated me from my social circle of friends and family. Luckily, you all kept visiting, dragging me to social activities such as discussing life, enjoying art, the theatre and music. Also, very important to me were the cooking and the outstanding meals with free-flowing, excellent wines. Thank you all for being so loyal, you often were life buoys to me.

I also wish to thank the most important boys in my life: Niels, Joep, Huib, Bram and their Henriette, and, last but not least, Gerard, you are simply the best. Without all of you, life would be unbearably light.
