Many new products are introduced to markets every single day. Some become successful, yet most disappear, never to surface again. Sometimes clear and straightforward reasons exist to explain why consumers do or do not accept the new product, though oftentimes a clear answer is missing. What factors drive consumers to take such a decision? This thesis attempts to create new insight into the key drivers of consumer adoption of new products.