Contents

Prologue

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Introduction</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>How to make sense of these activities</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Institutional theory and organizational fields</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reintroducing Bourdieu into institutional theory</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Central research questions</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Outline</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Part I  Studying an organizational field

1. Institutional theory’s pendulum swings                                   | 28   |
   1.1 In search of a balanced theory of action                              | 29   |
   1.2 Swinging back and forth                                               | 33   |
2. Bringing Bourdieu back into institutional theory                          | 36   |
   2.1 Applying Bourdieu in a piecemeal fashion: a critique                  | 36   |
   2.2 A theory of practice                                                  | 39   |
   Concluding remarks                                                        | 50   |
3. Methodological contemplations                                             | 52   |
   3.1 Bourdieu and the interpretive perspective                            | 52   |
   3.2 Reconstructing the issue’s emergence                                 | 55   |
   3.3 An organizational field ethnography                                  | 58   |
   3.4 Reflection                                                            | 62   |

Part II  How honour-related violence became an issue within the Dutch public discourse

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Introduction</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Part II: theoretical underpinnings</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Part II: outline</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
4. Defining honour-related violence                                           | 71   |
   4.1 The emergence of a contested label                                     | 71   |
   4.2 Developing a new label: honour-related violence                        | 77   |
   4.3 How these labels contributed to the emergence of a Dutch HRV field     | 82   |
5. Honour killings as field-configuring events                               | 85   |
   5.1 Analysing field-configuring events                                     | 85   |
5.2 How honour killings become critical events 87
5.3 Discussion about the attribution of the “honour killing” label 95
5.4 Disputes about the cultural background to honour killings 104
5.5 How these events contributed to the emergence of a Dutch HRV field 109

6. Changing macro-cultural discourses 111
6.1 Multiculturalism and gender-inequality 113
6.2 Social cohesion, national imaginaries and the creation of the other 118
6.3 How the changes in macro-cultural discourses contributed to the emergence of a Dutch HRV field 121

7. The moral panic driving the attention for honour killings 123
7.1 Amplifying issue attention: the moral panic concept 124
7.2 Honour killings, moral panic and the emergence of an issue-based field 127
7.3 How the moral panic about honour killings contributed to the emergence of a Dutch HRV field 131

Part III State practices and emerging field configurations

Introduction 134
Bourdieu on state power 136
Part III: outline 138

8. The political field as a field of struggle 140
8.1 Field-configuring events within the political field 141
8.2 Accelerating the honour-related violence debate: Gül’s murder 146
8.3 Developing a better understanding of the problem: two studies and a pilot 149
8.4 Assigning honour-related violence “priority project status” 152
8.5 Questioning the priority project’s adequacy 155
8.6 Presenting the interministerial programme 157
8.7 How these state practices contributed to the emergence of a Dutch HRV field 160

9. Key actors and their capital 166
9.1 Key actors and their roles within the emerging HRV field 167
9.2 The agenda setters 169
9.3 The experts 171
9.4 The bridge builders 173
9.5 The financiers 175
9.6 The regular function 176
9.7 Concluding remarks 178

10. Discussions about the label of honour-related violence 181
10.1 The Working Definition versus the Definition-in-use 183
10.2 Moving beyond the definition 191
10.3 Concluding remarks 194

11. Collaborative practices within the HRV field 197
11.1 Emerging field configurations: a schematic representation 198
11.2 Collaborative practices between the state and umbrella organizations 201
11.3 Collaborative practices between the state and local network partners 206
11.4 Network collaboration within the HRV field 210
11.5 Network partners and migrant organizations: lack of trust 214
11.6 Concluding remarks 218

Conclusion and discussion 222
The emergence of the Dutch honour-related violence field 223
Field emergence: a multi-layered process 224
The three phases of issue-based field emergence 238
Critical preconditions for field emergence 257
Bringing Bourdieu back into institutional theory: an update 235
Bourdieu and the structure-agency dilemma 256
The added value of Bourdieu’s theory in practice 257
Updating Bourdieu's framework with the addition of institutional concepts 258
Future research 238
Lessons for the public domain 239

Epilogue: Newsletter of the Platform for Honour and Freedom 240

References 242

Appendixes
Appendix 1: Occurrences of the “honour killing” and “honour-related violence” labels in the media and in politics 254
Appendix 2: Example from the matrix on Gül’s murder 256
Appendix 3: Observations 257
Appendix 4: Information on the respondents and their backgrounds 258
Appendix 5: Interview schedule 263

Summary 267

Acknowledgments 280