CONTENTS

Acknowledgements 6
List of Figures 8
Note on Translations 16
Note on Illustrations 18

1 Introduction: ‘of murder, strangling, burning and bloodshed’ 21

2 Theory and Methodology 35
  2.1 Introduction: the issue of violence 35
  2.2 A working definition of violence 36
  2.3 Violence as representation and imagination 42
  2.4 The printed image in history and historiography 51
  2.5 On printmaking 61

3 A Distance in Time: the Dutch Revolt 65
  3.1 Introduction: re-imagining old material 65
  3.2 A new market for the Revolt 71
  3.3 ‘Old bad, artless prints’ 75
  3.4 Bor revisited 80
  3.5 A new vision for the Revolt? 103
  3.6 Conclusions: from siege map to siege miracle 109

4 A Distance in Practice: Judicial Violence 113
  4.1 Introduction: a botched beheading 113
  4.2 A market for martyrs: publishing illustrated martyrologies
       in the Dutch Republic 117
  4.3 Martyr prints and visualizing violence 120
  4.4 The publication of Van Haemstede’s and Van Braght’s martyrologies 127
  4.5 What makes a martyr print a martyr print 131
  4.6 Histories, tragic histories, and execution prints: an Anabaptist martyr, a Spanish noble man, and a Portuguese murderess 147
  4.7 Selling violence: form and format 170
  4.8 The execution: from market square to book market? 177

5 A Distance in Place: Violence and the Great Turkish War
       in the work of Romeyn de Hooghe 183
  5.1 Introduction: the ‘Turkish Terror’ revisited 183
  5.2 Romeyn de Hooghe and his prints on the Great Turkish War 187
  5.3 ‘Without regard for sex or age’: norms for warfare with ‘the Turk’ 194
  5.4 An economy of heads 199
  5.5 Triumphalia and satire 206
  5.6 Conclusions: inverted violence 218

6 Conclusions: The Interest in the Imaginary 221
  Appendix: Selection of Source Material 229
  Appendix: The Spanish Fury in Bor and Hooft 232
  Bibliography 237
  Primary Sources 219
  Newspapers 224
  Secondary Sources 225
  Summary 253
  Curriculum Vitae 259